DEFENDANT-INTERVENOR HAMMETT'S BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO DISMISS

Defendant-intervenor Seth Hammett, through undersigned counsel, submits the following authorities and argument in support of his motion to dismiss this action.

I. THIS ACTION IS BARRED UNDER THE DOCTRINES OF ISSUE AND CLAIM PRECLUSION.

For the first time since adoption of the Alabama Constitution of 1901, the Alabama Legislature in 2001 fulfilled its duty under the Constitutions of Alabama and the United States to enact statutes redrawing the districts from which members of the Alabama House and Senate are elected. Ala. Acts No. 2001-727 and 2001-729. All previous redistricting plans in the last half of the twentieth century were drawn either by a federal court or by the Legislature under federal court order. Immediately, these 2001 statutory redistricting plans were challenged in federal and state court by plaintiffs represented by counsel in the instant action. The claims asserted in the amended complaint in this action have already been adjudicated in at least two prior cases, Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d 1279 (S.D. Ala. 2002) (3-judge court), and Rice v. English, 835 So.2d 157 (Ala. 2002), and are barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel.

A. THE HOLDING OF MONTIEL V. DAVIS.

In Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d 1279 (S.D. Ala. 2002) (3-judge court), this Court addressed constitutional challenges to the same Alabama House and Senate plans under attack in the instant action and held that the plans meet constitutional requirements. The third amended complaint in Montiel v. Davis in separate counts asserted statewide one-person, one-vote and racial vote dilution claims against the House and Senate plans and alleged unconstitutional racial gerrymanders in three House and two Senate districts. 01-447 Doc. No. 43. This action is barred by the doctrines of claim and issue preclusion, because the Gustafson amended complaint presents claims and issues that were raised, or could have been raised, in Montiel v. Davis, and because the parties in the instant action are in privity with and were adequately represented by the parties in Montiel v. Davis.

First, in Montiel v. Davis, this Court made findings of fact about the redistricting guidelines utilized by the Legislature:

The Alabama Legislature established Guidelines for Reapportionment and Redistricting through the work of its Permanent Legislative Committee on Reapportionment ("PLCR") which provide, in pertinent part:

In accordance with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, legislative and State Board of Education districts will be drawn to achieve "substantial equality of population among the various districts."

a. As a general proposition, deviations from the "ideal district" population should be justifiable either as a result of limitations of census geography, or as a result of the promotion of a rational state policy.

b. In keeping with subpart a, above, proponents of legislative and State Board of Education reapportionment plans should establish as a high priority minimizing population deviations among the districts. In any case, the relative population deviation for any legislative or state board of education district should not exceed plus or minus five percent (5%). Adherence to this rule will insure that the overall deviation in the plan does not exceed ten percent (10%), which is generally considered by controlling federal judicial decisions as a permissible overall deviation.

c. Any proponent submitting a proposal to the Reapportionment Committee or the Legislature shall submit a detailed explanation of how the deviations in the proposed plan further the rational state policies described in Section IV of these Guidelines, or are necessitated by census geography.

The Guidelines, at Section IV, also favor the use of traditional race-neutral districting criteria such as compactness, contiguity, respect for communities of interest, preservation of the cores of existing districts and avoidance of conflicts between incumbents.

215 F.Supp.2d at 1282-83 (citation and footnote omitted).

Second, this Court made findings of fact about the partisan designs of the plans:

Plaintiffs have proffered no evidence to refute the abundant evidence submitted by the defendants and defendant-intervenors which establishes that black voters and Democratic voters in Alabama are highly correlated; that the Legislature utilized recent election returns to ascertain actual voter behavior; and that Acts 2001-727 and 2001-729 were the product of the Democratic Legislators' partisan political objective to design Senate and House plans that would preserve their respective Democratic majorities.

215 F.Supp.2d at 1283.

Third, this Court rejected claims that the population deviations in the plans are unconstitutional:

To survive summary judgment, the plaintiff would have to produce further evidence to show that the apportionment process had a "taint of arbitrariness or discrimination.” Roman v. Sincock, 377 U.S. [695,] 710 [(1964)]. In other words, for deviations below 10%, the state is entitled to a presumption that the apportionment plan was the result of an “honest and good faith effort to construct districts ... as nearly of equal population as is practicable.” Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. [533,] 577 [(1964)]. However, this is a rebuttable presumption. Daly [v. Hunt,], 93 F.3d [1212,] 1220 [(4th Cir. 1996)] (emphasis added). It is undisputed that Alabama is here entitled to this critical presumption. In order to rebut this presumption, plaintiffs had “the burden of showing that the ‘minor’ deviation in the plan results solely from the promotion of an unconstitutional or irrational state policy.” Marylanders [for Fair Representation v. Schaefer], 849 F.Supp. [1022,] 1032 [(D. Md. 1994)] (emphasis added). The plaintiffs were further required to “demonstrate ... that the asserted unconstitutional or irrational state policy is the actual reason for the deviation.” Id. (emphasis in original), citing, Karcher [v. Daggett], 462 U.S. 725, 740-44 (1983). “In addition, the plaintiff[s] must prove that the minor population deviation is not caused by promotion of legitimate state policies.” Marylanders, 849 F.Supp. at 1032 (emphasis in original). The “use of a plus or minus five percent population window” is not an illegitimate state purpose or objective. Id. at 1034, citing, Voinovich [v. Quilter], 507 U.S. [146,] 160 (1993) (“requirement is not an inflexible one.”); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. at 577-81, 84 S.Ct. at 1389-92 (“more flexibility may therefore be constitutionally permissible with respect to state legislative apportionment than in congressional districting.”). Plaintiffs have simply failed to carry their burden.

215 F.Supp.2d at 1286.

Fourth, this Court held that neither plan was racially gerrymandered to under-populate districts with substantial black populations, which it found to be correlated with Democratic voters, and to over-populate heavily white districts, which it found were correlated with Republican voters:

Plaintiffs, despite their contentions to the contrary, have failed to proffer evidence, either direct or circumstantial, which establishes to any degree that the Alabama Legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles such as those set forth in Section IV of the Guidelines to racial considerations in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. ...

B. THE HOLDING OF RICE V. ENGLISH.

Three different plaintiffs, represented by counsel for the Montiel plaintiffs in this Court, unsuccessfully attacked the population deviations in the Senate plan, Act No. 2001-727, in state court, claiming they violated the Alabama Constitution. Rice v. English, 835 So.2d 157, 160 (Ala. 2002) (“The Rice plaintiffs contended that the new senate districts failed to satisfy Art. I, § 33, and Art. IX, § 200, Ala. Const.1901, in that the population of the new districts was not “as nearly equal to each other ... as may be.” Art. IX, § 200.”). The Alabama Supreme Court upheld the trial court’s award of summary judgment in favor of the defendants, relying on federal Fourteenth Amendment case law, not as binding precedent on the state constitutional question, but as “as illustrations or analogies....” 835 So.2d at 167. The Alabama Supreme Court’s construction of state constitutional requirements closely tracks the principles of federal constitutional law:

The trial court afforded the Legislature appropriate deference in its solution to the difficult question of dividing the State into 35 senate districts with approximately equal population. The districts created by the Legislature are within plus or minus five percent of the ideal population of a senate district. While various members of this Court, had we been privileged to participate in the legislative deliberations and then to cast votes according to our respective consciences, might have opted for different district boundaries, less disregard of county lines, or greater concern for more uniformity of population within districts, we recognize that the people elected us to cast our votes as judges and not as legislators. As judges, we cannot overturn the redistricting plan on the grounds asserted by the Rice plaintiffs in the appeal before us. The Rice plaintiffs have failed to overcome the presumption of constitutionality that precedent requires us to attach to the redistricting plan.

835 So.2d at 167-68 (footnote omitted).

C. THE LEGAL STANDARDS OF CLAIM PRECLUSION AND THEIR APPLICATION TO THIS CASE.

The principles of res judicata as they apply to challenges of state legislative redistricting plans were explored in Thompson v. Smith, 52 F.Supp.2d 1364, (M.D. Ala. 1999) (3-judge court), which, pursuant to federal rule, applied the Alabama case law governing res judicata.

Under Alabama law, the essential elements of res judicata are: “(1) a prior judgment on the merits, (2) rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, (3) with substantial identity of the parties, and (4) with the same cause of action presented in both suits.” If all of these elements are met, any claim that was or could have been adjudicated in the previous action is precluded. If even one element of the four is not met, however, res judicata is not applicable.

52 F.Supp.2d at 1368-69 (quoting N.A.A.C.P. v. Hunt, 891 F.2d 1555, 1560 (11th Cir.1990) (citations omitted) (emphasis added). There can be no dispute that Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d 1279 (S.D. Ala. 2002), and Rice v. English, 835 So.2d 157 (Ala. 2002), are prior judgments on the merits by courts of competent jurisdiction. An inspection of the record will show that elements (3) and (4) of res judicata are also satisfied here.

1. The Parties Are Substantially Identical.

Lionel Gustafson and the other plaintiffs in the instant case were not parties to Montiel v. Davis or to Rice v. English. But, for the same reasons cited in Thompson v. Smith, supra, they share substantial identity with the Montiel and Rice plaintiffs.

Alabama law defines ‘identity of the parties’ broadly--as broadly as due process allows. See Century 21 Preferred Properties, Inc. v. Alabama Real Estate Comm’n, 401 So.2d 764, 770 (Ala.1981). The key inquiry is whether the interests of the party against whom res judicata is asserted were adequately represented by a party to the prior lawsuit. See id. When the party against whom res judicata is asserted was not itself a party to the prior lawsuit, however, the court must undertake a further inquiry to determine whether the application of res judicata would offend the due process guarantees of the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution. See Richards v. Jefferson County, 517 U.S. 793, 797 n. 4 (1996).

Thompson v. Smith, 52 F.Supp.2d at 1369.

Here, as in Thompson v. Smith, the Montiel plaintiffs, the Rice plaintiffs and the Gustafson plaintiffs were and still are represented by the same lawyer, Mark Montiel. The plaintiffs in all three actions challenged the same State House and/or Senate redistricting plans, asking this Court and the state court to declare the plans unconstitutional, and asking for the same relief, namely, the adoption of entirely new statewide plans drawn by the court.

Like the plaintiffs in Thompson v. Smith, the Montiel plaintiffs “sought to be designated as representatives of all [similarly situated] Alabama voters.” Id. See Montiel plaintiffs’ third amended complaint, 01-447 Doc. No. 63, ¶¶ 37-39. The putative Montiel class included all Alabama citizens residing in districts whose populations allegedly violated the mandate of one person, one vote and all citizens of the state residing in racially gerrymandered districts. Id. Thus “all of the [Gustafson] plaintiffs are members of this putative class.” Thompson v. Smith, 52 F.Supp.2d at 1369. In affirmative defenses 2 and 3, the Guin intervenors’ answer to the Montiel plaintiffs’ third amended complaint alleged that plaintiffs’ claims were mere pretexts for the partisan political objectives of certain supporters of the Republican Party, allegations that the Montiel plaintiffs never tried to deny.

By the reasoning of Thompson v. Smith, the Gustafson plaintiffs “cannot be characterized as strangers to the [Montiel v. Davis] action and are more properly characterized as alter-egos of the [Montiel v. Davis] plaintiffs with identical or closely-aligned interests.” Thompson v. Smith, 52 F.Supp.2d at 1369. The Gustafson plaintiffs were adequately represented by the Montiel plaintiffs. Id. (citing Aerojet-General Corp. v. Askew, 511 F.2d 710, 719 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 908 (1975) (subsequent suit by a non-party may be precluded “if one of the parties to the suit is so closely aligned with [the non-party’s] interests as to be his virtual representative”)).

The application in Thompson v. Smith of the due process principles of Richards v. Jefferson County also closely tracks the circumstances of the instant case.

Richards suggests that some of the concerns that should inform a court in its due-process analysis include whether the plaintiffs in the prior litigation purported to sue on behalf of a class that includes the plaintiff against whom res judicata is asserted, whether there was “full and fair consideration of the common issue,” [517 U.S.] at 801, whether the non-party had been informed that the original lawsuit is pending, id. at 799; and whether the non-party could “choose for himself whether to appear or default, acquiesce or contest.” Id.

52 F.Supp.2d at 1370. Here, as in Thompson v. Smith, the Gustafson plaintiffs had notice of the pending Montiel v. Davis action and had ample opportunity to be heard in it. Id.

“The [Montiel] plaintiffs, moreover, expressly sought to represent a class that clearly includes [the Gustafson plaintiffs], and there is every reason to conclude that [this] court took care to protect the interests of non-party class members.” Id. The Montiel plaintiffs sought to represent a plaintiff class of all citizens of Alabama and asked the federal court to certify a defendant class of all probate judges in Alabama. As in Thompson v. Smith, “[the Gustafson plaintiffs] were fully aware of these class claims and yet did nothing. Under these circumstances, the court cannot conclude that it would offend due process to bind [the Gustafson plaintiffs] to the prior litigation, and we turn next to the issue of whether the same causes of actions were present.” Id.

2. Count One, One Person, One Vote: The Same Cause of Action Was Presented in Montiel v. Davis.

The operative paragraphs of Count One in the Gustafson amended complaint are:

129. Plaintiffs’ constitutional right to such equality in voting strength has been diluted and debased through the enactment and continued use of the state legislative redistricting plans by which members of the Alabama Legislature are to be elected as the state legislative redistricting plans contain such malapportioned districts as to cause Plaintiffs and other voters living in those districts to be underrepresented and therefore deny them the right to equal protection.

130. There is no consistently-applied, legitimate state policy which justifies the population deviations in the current state legislative redistricting plans. Instead, the population deviations are designed to maximize the electoral effectiveness of voters in underpopulated regions and to minimize or dissipate the voting strength of voters in overpopulated districts. Thus, the state legislative redistricting plans, which intentionally and invidiously discriminate against voters in overpopulated districts, are tainted with arbitrariness or discrimination, in violation of the United States Constitutional guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.

As noted above, this Court rejected these one-person, one-vote claims in Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d at 1286. The Montiel plaintiffs failed to prove that the minor deviations in the House and Senate plans violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. They could not demonstrate that the population deviations less than plus or minus 5% were not “the result of an ‘honest and good faith effort to construct districts ... as nearly of equal population as is practicable.’” Id. (quoting Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. [533,] 577 [(1964)]). They could not “show that the apportionment process had a ‘taint of arbitrariness or discrimination.’” Id. (quoting Roman v. Sincock, 377 U.S. [695,] 710 [(1964)]). They could not “prove that the minor population deviation is not caused by promotion of legitimate state policies.” Id. They “failed to proffer evidence, either direct or circumstantial, which establishes to any degree that the Alabama Legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles such as those set forth in Section IV of the Guidelines to racial considerations in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.” Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d at 1283.

No matter how the Gustafson amended complaint tries to rephrase the one-person, one-vote claim, it does not and cannot state a cause of action different from the claim that was adjudicated on the merits in Montiel v. Davis. Count One is barred by res judicata.

3. Count Two, Partisan Gerrymandering: The Same Cause of Action Was Presented in Montiel v. Davis.

On this point, as well, Thompson v. Smith referred to Alabama law:

To determine whether two lawsuits present the same causes of action, Alabama courts apply a test “that in certain respects is similar to, but which is not the same as, the ‘same transaction’ test” in the Restatement (Second) of Judgments. Equity Resources Management, Inc. v. Vinson, 723 So.2d 634, 637 (Ala.1998). Because there is no mathematically precise definition for when there is an identity of causes of action, the test for making such determination has many formulations, but the principal inquiries are essentially two: (1) whether the claims arise out of” the same evidence, wrongful acts or disputes, see id. at 637, 638, or present the same issues (in particular, factual ones), see, e.g., Selma Foundry & Supply Co. v. Peoples Bank & Trust Co., 598 So.2d 844, 848 (Ala.1992); and (2) whether the claims would be subject to proof by the same evidence, Vinson, 723 So.2d at 637. Also probative, but not determinative, is “the identity [of] or differences in the forms of the two actions.” Id. at 638.

52 F.Supp.2d at 1370.

The operative paragraphs of Count Two in the Gustafson amended complaint are:

133. The state legislative redistricting plans and the individual districts contained therein are the result of gross partisan gerrymanders against Republicans, including Plaintiffs. In drawing the legislative districts, the Democratic-controlled Alabama Legislature used classification by political party in an invidious manner or in a way unrelated to any legitimate legislative objective.

134. Therefore, the partisan gerrymanders which are the state legislative redistricting plans and the individual districts contained therein violate Article 4, Section 2 of the United States Constitution, the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and thus 42 U.S.C. § 1983, by fragmenting cohesive communities of interest and political subdivisions between purported districts while no legitimate, consistently-applied state policy is supported or furthered by the needless division of these communities.

136. The state legislative redistricting plans and the individual districts contained therein constitute intentional discrimination against the Republican Party, its members and other citizens who it may support as candidates.

138. The plans and districts contained therein provide for the unjustified entrenchment of the Democratic Party's power in the Alabama Legislature. No legitimate redistricting criteria of any sort were used by the Alabama Legislature in crafting the state legislative redistricting plans. To the extent that Defendants claim any such criteria were used, such criteria depart radically from traditional and historical legitimate criteria. That departure is unexplainable in any way other than as an effort on the part of the Democratic-controlled Alabama Legislature and then-Governor Siegelman to maintain or obtain more partisan political advantage for the Democratic voters; politics and a goal of $\pm 5\%$ population deviation trumped any legitimate, consistently applied state interest. Due to the gerrymandering, the Republican Party – the party receiving majority of total votes in a relevant election including presidential and gubernatorial, among others – has failed to obtain a majority of the relevant seats in an election under the state legislative redistricting plans and will be prevented from doing so in the foreseeable future.

139. The impermissible partisan gerrymanders that are the state legislative redistricting plans are visible to the judicial eye and subject to judicially manageable standards.

This partisan gerrymandering claim was adjudicated in Montiel v. Davis when this Court held that the House and Senate plans did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment notwithstanding its finding “that Acts 2001-727 and 2001-729 were the product of the Democratic Legislators’ partisan political objective to design Senate and House plans that would preserve their respective Democratic majorities.” 215 F.Supp.2d at 1283. The Montiel plaintiffs alleged that the districts were gerrymandered for a predominantly racial purpose, and the partisan motive this Court found was asserted as a defense to the racial gerrymandering claim. The Montiel plaintiffs did not appeal the holding that the objective of preserving Democratic majorities failed to provide evidence that the population deviations less than plus or minus 5% were not “the result of an honest and good faith effort to construct districts ... as nearly of equal population as is practicable” or “that the apportionment process had a taint of arbitrariness or discrimination.” 215 F.Supp.2d at 1286 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Gustafson plaintiffs’ Count Two is nothing but a blatant attempt to relitigate this holding.

Actually, even though their several amended complaints did not explicitly allege it, the Montiel plaintiffs did present a partisan gerrymandering contention in support of their motion for summary judgment. Their brief in support of summary judgment argued: “A population deviation in state legislative districts that is less than 10% is not acceptable under the Fourteenth Amendment if it was the product of racial gerrymandering or other political considerations.” 01-447 Doc. No. 95 at 15 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added).

Defendant-intervenors Guin and Hayden squarely confronted this partisan gerrymander argument in their brief opposing Montiel’s motion for summary judgment:

When the Fourth Circuit addressed the question whether the Daly plaintiffs had met their burden of proof for challenging population deviations under 10%, it considered and rejected the very same contentions Mr. Montiel is urging on this Court. “To survive summary judgment, the plaintiff would have to produce further evidence to show that the apportionment process had a ‘taint of arbitrariness or discrimination.’ 93 F.3d at 1220 (citing Roman v. Sincok, 377 U.S. at 710). First, it rejected the contention that political motives can produce the requisite “taint,” an argument raised at page 15 of Mr. Montiel’s brief. 93 F.3d at 1220-21 (citing Gaffney v. Cummings, supra). This ruling was recently reaffirmed in Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 1456-57 (2001) (recognizing “a constitutional political objective, namely, the creation of . . . safe Democratic seat[s]”).

01-447 Doc. No. 102 at 5-6 (emphasis added).

Thus the partisan gerrymandering claim in Count Two “arise[s] out of” the same evidence, wrongful acts or disputes” presented in Montiel v. Davis and “would be subject to proof by the same evidence” as the evidence previously presented to this Court. Thompson v. Smith, 52 F.Supp.2d at 1370. Nor can the Gustafson plaintiffs resurrect this issue by pleading another alleged constitutional basis (Article IV, § 2)¹ for the same substantive inquiry.

As the U.S. Supreme Court has said, in the context of federal court deferral to state court consideration of state legislative redistricting, a state “can have only one set of legislative districts,” and the duty to defer to a court that has already begun to address redistricting issues “does not require that the federal and state-court complaints be identical; it instead focuses on the nature of the relief requested: reapportionment of election districts.” Grove v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 35 (1993) (citing Scott v. Germano, 381 U.S. 407 (1965) (per curiam)). This principle applies with even greater force where both federal and state courts have already upheld Alabama’s one set of legislative districts against a myriad of claims. Count Two of the Gustafson amended complaint is barred by the doctrine of claim preclusion or res judicata.

4. Count Three, Partisan Gerrymandering Under the First Amendment: The Same Cause of Action Was Presented or Could Have Been Presented in Montiel v. Davis.

¹ Paragraph 134 of the amended complaint also asserts a violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. But § 1983 provides no substantive rights; it is simply statutory authority for granting judicial relief when a violation of substantive rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States is established.

Count Three of the amended complaint realleges the same partisan gerrymandering claim set out in Count Two. The only significant difference between Counts II and III is that the former count bases its claim on Article IV, § 2, of the Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment, while the latter count bases its claim on the First Amendment. The operative allegations of Count Three are:

142. The First Amendment to the United States Constitution provides the right of freedom of speech and of association. The state legislative redistricting plans impinge upon the freedom of association rights guaranteed by the First Amendment of the United States Constitution by packing and gerrymandering Republican-leaning districts, thereby penalizing and burdening Republican representatives and voters, including Plaintiffs, solely by reason of political ideology, beliefs, affiliation or association. Public debates on issues of public importance are also chilled in violation of the First Amendment.

143. There is no consistently-applied, legitimate state policy which justified the population deviations or gerrymandering in these Republican-leaning districts in the state legislative redistricting plans. Instead, the population deviations and gerrymandered districts are tainted by arbitrariness and discrimination, resulting in a violation of Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights and 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

Thus the alleged evidentiary basis for Count Three is identical to that for Count Two, and it is barred for the same reasons Count Two is barred by the doctrine of claim preclusion.

Even if either Count Two or Count Three, or both of them, actually alleged causes of action distinct from those presented in Montiel v. Davis (they do not), they would be barred nevertheless, because they could have been raised in the prior action.

The traditional res judicata case (frequently referred to as a claim preclusion) involves prior litigation between a plaintiff and a defendant, which is decided on the merits by a court of competent jurisdiction, and then a subsequent attempt by the prior plaintiff to relitigate the same cause of action against the same defendant, or perhaps to relitigate a different claim not previously litigated but which arises out of the same evidence. Alabama law is well settled that this will not be allowed. A valid, final judgment on the merits of the claim extinguishes the claim. If the plaintiff won, the claim is merged into the judgment; if the defendant won, the plaintiff is barred from relitigating any matter which could have been litigated in the prior action.

D. PRINCIPLES OF RES JUDICATA PREVENT CONSIDERATION OF ALLEGED CHANGES IN LAW.

For nearly two years before this action was commenced the press has been full of assertions by Republican Party officials that a new lawsuit challenging Alabama's House and Senate redistricting plans would be filed because a Georgia case had changed the law. Larios v. Cox, 300 F.Supp.2d 1320 (N.D. Ga.), aff'd summarily, 124 S.Ct. 2806 (2004). In subsequent sections of this brief we will show that Larios did not change the law governing the redistricting issues presented to this Court in Montiel v. Davis and now in the instant action.

However, even if there had been a change in law, it would provide no basis for avoiding the application of res judicata in this action. It is well established that even retroactive application of a change in decisional law does not apply to claims that have been litigated and are barred by res judicata. Glazner v. Glazner, 347 F.3d 1212, 1221 n.5 (11th Cir. 2003) (“[R]es judicata and procedural barriers such as statutes of limitations necessarily circumscribe the retroactive application of the rule we announce today.”) (citing James Beam Distilling Co. v. Georgia, 501 U.S. 529, 535 (1991) (internal quotation marks omitted)).

II. THE AMENDED COMPLAINT FAILS TO STATE A CLAIM UPON WHICH RELIEF CAN BE GRANTED.

It will not be necessary for this Court to consider whether the amended complaint states claims upon which relief can be granted if it rules that this action is barred by principles of claim and/or issue preclusion. Nevertheless, in the interests of judicial economy, we believe the Court should rule, in the alternative, that dismissal is warranted under Rule 12(b)(6), Fed.R.Civ.P.

1. The Amended Complaint Cannot Stand on Conclusory Allegations of an Available Better Plan.

In Montiel v. Davis this Court correctly interpreted controlling precedent to place on the plaintiffs attacking population deviations under $\pm 5\%$ the burden of rebutting the presumption that the Legislature made an “honest and good faith effort to construct districts ... as nearly of equal population as is practicable.” 215 F.Supp.2d at 1286 (quoting Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 577 (1964)). “In order to rebut this presumption, plaintiffs had the burden of showing that the minor deviation in the plan results solely from the promotion of an unconstitutional or irrational state policy.” 215 F.Supp.2d at 1286 (quoting Marylanders for Fair Representation v. Schaefer, 849 F.Supp. 1022, 1032 (D. Md. 1994) (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted). The Gustafson plaintiffs’ merely conclusory allegations, fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

The crucial conclusory allegation of the amended complaint is paragraph 110:

Alternative plans can be drawn which demonstrate that districts which have lower population deviations (and which applied legitimate, consistently-applied state interests) were not only possible but easily attainable and therefore practicable. In addition, alternative plans can be drawn that distribute state legislative seats geographically according to population figures. Alternative plans with lower deviations (and which applied legitimate, consistently applied state policies) and which distributed state legislative seats geographically according to population figures were available to the Alabama Legislature during the 2001 redistricting process.

The amended complaint does not identify any such “alternative” plans that even allegedly produce smaller population deviations than those in Acts No. 2001-727 and 2001-729 and that better satisfy the legitimate redistricting criteria adopted by the Legislature’s written guidelines. The allegation that such better alternative plans were available to the Legislature during the redistricting process was demonstrably false in Montiel v. Davis and remains false today. The Montiel plaintiffs neither alleged nor produced evidence that the minor population deviations about which they complained were not necessary to comply with the Voting Rights Act and to effectuate the legitimate state interests identified in the Guidelines adopted by the Permanent Legislative Committee on Reapportionment: compactness and contiguity; the wishes of constituents; avoidance of contests between incumbents; preservation of communities of interests, “including but not limited to racial, ethnic, geographic, governmental, regional, social, cultural, partisan, or historic interests; county municipal, or voting precinct boundaries; and commonality of communications;” and preservation of the cores of existing districts. 215 F.Supp.2d at 1282-83.

To the contrary, the zero deviation plans introduced in the 2001 Legislature by Republican legislators and identified by the Montiel plaintiffs demonstrate why the Supreme Court has allowed state legislatures leeway with respect to population equality in order to serve the other legitimate state redistricting interests. The zero deviation French Senate Plan splits 10 more counties and 77 more precincts than does Act 2001-727. Compare Exhibits S and T submitted with Guin motion for summary judgment, 01-447 Doc. No. 83. The zero deviation Pringle House Plan splits 22 more counties and 79 more precincts than does Act 2001-729. Compare Exhibits U and V submitted with Guin motion for summary judgment, 01-447 Doc. No. 83.

The zero deviation plans sponsored by the Republican leadership in the Legislature would have created even more majority-black districts than exist in Acts 2001-727 and 2001-727. The French Senate Plan had nine majority-black districts, compared with eight in Act 2001-727, and the size of the black majorities in the French Plan were significantly larger. Compare Exhibits F and W submitted with Guin motion for summary judgment, 01-447 Doc. No. 83. The Pringle House Plan had 28 majority-black districts, compared with 27 in Act 2001-729, and the size of the black majorities in the Pringle Plan were on average significantly larger. Compare Exhibits H and X submitted with Guin motion for summary judgment, 01-447 Doc. No. 83. Thus, unlike the plans enacted by the Legislature, which carefully balanced the competing federal mandates to avoid retrogression of black voting strength, required by § 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, and to avoid “segregating” voters by race, prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993), cases, these Republican plans would have minimized the number of seats black voters could influence by packing as many African Americans into as many districts as possible, arguably violating both the Voting Rights Act and Shaw.

In short, like the Montiel plaintiffs, the Gustafson plaintiffs can point to no alternative plan that would have done a better job of reconciling the complex mix of federal, state, regional and political interests the Guidelines sought to protect. Their strictly conclusory allegation that better plans could be drawn by this Court is insufficient to rebut the presumption of validity to which the Legislature’s plans are entitled.

2. Larios Did Not Change the Law This Court Applied in Montiel v. Davis.

Larios v. Cox, 300 F.Supp.2d 1320 (N.D. Ga.), aff'd summarily, 124 S.Ct. 2806 (2004), did not change the law applied by this Court in Montiel v. Davis regarding plaintiffs' burden of alleging facts that rebut the presumption that the Legislature made a good faith effort to minimize population deviations. To the contrary, the three-judge district court's opinion cites Montiel v. Davis and the precedents this Court relied on. Larios, 300 F.Supp.2d at 1340. Indeed, Larios applied the Montiel v. Davis constitutional standards to reject the contention of the Georgia Assembly that the rule of $\pm 5\%$ is an irrebuttable safe harbor. 300 F.Supp.2d at 1325 ("legislators and plan drawers for both houses believed there was a 'safe harbor' of $\pm 5\%$ in the reapportionment of state legislative districts and, therefore, that population deviations not rising to that level did not have to be supported by any legitimate state interest") (emphasis added).

Indeed, the sole precedential value of the Supreme Court's summary affirmance of Larios is reaffirmation of the previously settled principle that $\pm 5\%$ is not an irrebuttable safe harbor. "Summary actions . . . should not be understood as breaking new ground but as applying principles established by prior decisions to the particular facts involved." Mandel v. Bradley, 432 U.S. 173, 176 (1977).

Because a summary affirmance is an affirmance of the judgment only, the rationale of the affirmance may not be gleaned solely from the opinion below. ...

Summary affirmances and dismissals for want of a substantial federal question without doubt reject the specific challenges presented in the statement of jurisdiction and do leave undisturbed the judgment appealed from. They do prevent lower courts from coming to opposite conclusions on the precise issues presented and necessarily decided by those actions.

Id. (citations omitted); accord, e.g., Lucas v. Townsend, 908 F.2d 851, 854 (11th Cir. 1990).

The holding of Larios, and thus the issue necessarily decided, is a narrow one, fully consistent with longstanding law, that the Georgia House and Senate plans violated the one-person, one-vote requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment when admittedly no effort was made to minimize population deviations. The only justifications proffered by the Assembly were (1) systematically to overpopulate certain historically under-represented regions of the state and (2) to defeat as many Republican incumbents as possible. 300 F.Supp.2d at 1325. The district court found that the plans “were not driven by any traditional redistricting criteria such as compactness, contiguity, and preserving county lines.” Id. at 1341-42.

In the instant case, the Gustafson plaintiffs, like the Montiel plaintiffs, have not alleged in Count One that the Alabama Legislature ignored all of the legitimate redistricting criteria announced in its guidelines and that the minor population deviations were driven solely by a systematic design to overpopulate particular regions of the state and to underpopulate others, and no such design appears on the face of the House and Senate plans. Nor does the Gustafson amended complaint allege that House and Senate Democrats set out to disadvantage as many Republican incumbents as possible, because they know that the incumbent protection criterion was applied fairly. Larios did not purport to establish a new rule that prohibits partisan considerations as one of the justifications for minor population deviations under $\pm 5\%$. The district court explicitly disavowed such a rule:

a redistricting process need not be free of politics in order to be constitutional. Politics and political considerations are, after all, “inseparable from districting and apportionment.” Gaffney [v. Cummings], 412 U.S. [735, 753 [(1973)]. As long as the population deviations are supported by a legitimate state interest, the court will not strike down a plan simply because political considerations played a role in its creation.

300 F.Supp.2d at 1354. In fact, Larios did not even decide the question whether partisan factors standing alone could be sufficient to justify minor population deviations. Id. at 1351. Of course, the Supreme Court’s summary affirmance did not decide this question either. See 124 S.Ct. at 2809-10 (Scalia, J., dissenting). Thus Gustafson cannot cite Larios in support of an argument that the principles this Court applied in Montiel v. Davis have been modified in the least.

3. The Privileges and Immunities Clause Does Not Guarantee the Right To Vote.

Count One of the amended complaint alleges in paragraph 123 that the Privileges and Immunities Clause in Article IV, § 2 of the Constitution², along with “other provisions of the United States Constitution,” guarantees a fundamental right to vote to U.S. citizens. This allegation was squarely rejected in 1874. Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. 162 (1874), which held that neither the Privileges and Immunities Clause in § 1 of the newly ratified Fourteenth Amendment nor the Privileges and Immunities Clause in Article IV, § 2, provides a federal right to vote, has never been overruled. Ipso facto, the Privileges and Immunities Clause provides no authority for the Supreme Court’s one-person, one-vote rule, which is grounded on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Reynolds v. Sims, supra.

B. COUNT TWO, ALLEGING A PARTISAN GERRYMANDER THAT VIOLATES THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, FAILS TO STATE A CLAIM.

1. The Binding Precedent of Vieth v. Jubelirer.

² Article IV, § 2, also contains the Interstate Rendition and Fugitive Slave Clauses, neither of which provides a right to vote.

For the first time since Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), the Supreme Court revisited the availability of a constitutional cause of action for partisan gerrymandering in Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267 (2004).³ In Vieth the Supreme Court affirmed the order of a three-judge district court granting the state's Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure of the complaint to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Four members of the Court, in Justice Scalia's plurality opinion, based their decision on the ground that all claims of partisan gerrymandering inject the courts inappropriately in political controversies, are not susceptible of principled and manageable judicial standards, and so are nonjusticiable. Four dissenters, in three separate opinions, concluded that partisan gerrymander claims are justiciable, and they proposed three different judicial standards for assessing when partisan considerations, though not of themselves unconstitutional, go too far and violate the equal protection rights and/or First Amendment rights of voters. Justice Kennedy in a concurring opinion provided the fifth vote for affirming dismissal of the complaint. He agreed with the plurality that neither the Bandemer plurality standard, Justice Powell's proposed standard in Bandemer, the standard proposed by the Vieth plaintiffs nor any of the standards proposed by the dissenters in Vieth was judicially manageable.

However, he declined to endorse the plurality's conclusion that all partisan gerrymander claims necessarily are nonjusticiable. Justice Kennedy "would not foreclose all possibility of judicial relief if some limited and precise rationale were found to correct an established violation of the Constitution in some redistricting cases." 541 U.S. at 306. "If workable standards do emerge to measure these burdens, however, courts should be prepared to order relief." Id. at 317.

The two questions this Court must address when deciding whether or not Count Two (and Count Three) of the Gustafson amended complaint states a claim upon which relief can be granted are (1) does it allege a judicial standard that is different from those already rejected by a majority of the Supreme Court in Vieth, and, if so, (2) is the new proposed standard judicially manageable, that is, does it provide a principled way to sort the "good" politics that a vibrant democracy depends on from the allegedly "bad" politics that somehow violates rights guaranteed citizens, individually or collectively, by the Constitution? Defendant-intervenor Hammett contends that the answer to question (1) is no, and so the amended complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Put differently, this Court may not proceed with the inquiry in (2) with respect to proposed standards the Supreme Court has now rejected.

To engage these issues, this Court first must undertake the (frankly tedious) task of reading and making some sense of the five opinions in Vieth. While much of the High Court's discourse focuses on disagreements among the justices, a few points of agreement emerge with certainty.

First, as the Justice who cast the fifth vote for the judgment in Vieth, Justice Kennedy's concurring opinion provides the narrowest rationale for the Court's decision. That is, the four-member plurality concluded that all partisan gerrymander claims are inherently nonjusticiable, so there can be no judicially manageable standard. Justice Kennedy, however, was willing to "adjudicate only what is in the papers before us." 541 U.S. at 313 (Kennedy, J., concurring). He agreed that all standards past and present before the Court are unmanageable, but he held open the possibility that future litigants and courts might discover a standard that is judicially manageable.

Second, this Court is bound to dismiss for failure to state any allegations in the Gustafson amended complaint that were rejected in Vieth. The three-judge court in Henderson v. Session proceeded to consider the merits of all the partisan gerrymander standards proposed by the named parties and amicus parties on remand from the Supreme Court⁴ and concluded that the Vieth plurality is correct: partisan gerrymander claims are inherently nonjusticiable. But this Court, like other lower federal courts, is not free to reconsider judicial standards that a Vieth majority has ruled are unmanageable and thus insufficient to state a claim. “When a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds” Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193 (1977) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Lower courts “are bound by both the Supreme Court’s choice of legal standard or test and by the result it reaches under that standard or test.” Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 947 F.2d 682, 691-92 (3d Cir. 1991), aff’d in relevant part, 505 U.S. 833 (1992).

Occasionally, the Supreme Court’s decision in a case reveals that a standard established in an earlier case no longer commands the allegiance of a majority of the Justices, but also reveals that no single substitute is endorsed by that majority of the Justices. Thereafter, the lower courts must determine whether to apply the old standard or, if not, what standard to apply. Fortunately, the Supreme Court has instructed the lower courts on how to resolve these issues.

⁴ Henderson v. Session, __ F.Supp.2d __, CA No. 2:03-cv-00354-TJW (E.D. Tex., June 5, 2005), Doc. No. 266 at 11, on remand from 125 S.Ct. 351 (2004) (“We can only fairly read the remand to suggest that the Justice providing the fifth vote sees the possibility of a workable standard emerging from this case, the rejected allegations of the complaint in Vieth aside.”) (emphasis added).

In splintered Supreme Court decisions where there has been a common denominator standard that would necessarily produce results with which a majority of the Justices from the controlling case would agree, the Supreme Court and the lower courts have consistently identified as binding precedent the opinion setting forth that standard.

Id. at 692-94 (citations omitted) (emphasis added). In Vieth there is no “common denominator standard” for lower courts to apply to determine whether an alleged partisan gerrymander is unconstitutional,⁵ but there is “common denominator” agreement between the plurality and Justice Kennedy about what standards do not establish unconstitutional political gerrymanders.

All members of the Court agreed with Justice Kennedy that “[a] determination that a gerrymander violates the law must rest on something more than the conclusion that political classifications were applied.” 541 U.S. at 307 (Kennedy, J., concurring); accord, 541 U.S. at 332 (Stevens, J., dissenting); 541 U.S. at 343 (Souter, J., dissenting) 541 U.S. at 357 (Breyer, J., dissenting). Nor is partisan proportional representation required. 541 U.S. at 288 (plurality opinion); accord, 541 U.S. at 338 (Stevens, J., dissenting); 541 U.S. at 352 n.7 (Souter, J., dissenting); 541 U.S. at 357-58 (Breyer, J., dissenting). And, disagreeing with the Scalia plurality, Justice Kennedy and the four dissenters generally agree that a judicially manageable political gerrymander standard “must rest instead on a conclusion that the classifications, though generally permissible, were applied in an invidious manner or in a way unrelated to any legitimate legislative objective.” 541 U.S. at 307 (Kennedy, J., concurring). But, since Justice Kennedy concluded “that the standards proposed in Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), by the parties before us, and by our dissenting colleagues are either unmanageable or inconsistent with precedent, or both,” 541 U.S. at 308 (Kennedy, J., concurring)⁶, it is possible to identify the proposed partisan gerrymander standards that were rejected by a majority of Justices in Vieth as either unmanageable or nonjusticiable:

⁵ See Solantic, LLC v. City of Neptune Beach, 410 F.3d 1250, 1261 n.10 (11th Cir. 2005) (“the Court has indicated that there may be situations where even the Marks inquiry does not yield any rule to be treated as binding in future cases.) (quoting Johnson v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Ga., 263 F.3d 1234, 1248 n. 12 (11th Cir.2001) (citing Nichols v. United States, 511 U.S. 738 (1994)). “As the Third Circuit explained, ‘the plurality and the concurrence took such markedly different approaches to the San Diego ordinance that there is no common denominator between them.’” Solantic, 410 F.3d at 1261 n.10 (quoting Rappa v. New Castle County, 18 F.3d 1043, 1058 (3d Cir.1994)).

1. The Vieth plaintiffs’ standard, rejected by five justices, was summarized

⁶ Nor was Justice Kennedy “able to discover, helpful discussions on the principles of fair districting discussed in the annals of parliamentary or legislative bodies. Our attention has not been drawn to statements of principled, well-accepted rules of fairness that should govern districting, or to helpful formulations of the legislator’s duty in drawing district lines.” 541 U.S. at 308 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

a plaintiff must “show that the mapmakers acted with a predominant intent to achieve partisan advantage,” which can be shown “by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence that other neutral and legitimate redistricting criteria were subordinated to the goal of achieving partisan advantage.” . . .

“Predominant intent” to disadvantage the plaintiff’s political group refers to the relative importance of that goal as compared with all the other goals that the map seeks to pursue--contiguity of districts, compactness of districts, observance of the lines of political subdivision, protection of incumbents of all parties, cohesion of natural racial and ethnic neighborhoods, compliance with requirements of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 regarding racial distribution, etc.

541 U.S. at 307 (plurality opinion) (emphasis in original) (bold emphasis added).

Justice Kennedy explained why he agreed that the Vieth plaintiffs’ standard was insufficient:

Failing to show that the alleged classifications are unrelated to the aims of apportionment, appellants’ evidence at best demonstrates only that the legislature adopted political classifications. That describes no constitutional flaw, at least under the governing Fourteenth Amendment standard. As a consequence, appellants’ complaint alleges no impermissible use of political classifications and so states no valid claim on which relief may be granted. It must be dismissed as a result. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 12(b)(6)

541 U.S. at 313 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (other citations omitted).

2. Even neutral, objective redistricting standards themselves cannot be relied on as providing a judicially manageable standard, because they are not altogether sound as independent judicial standards for measuring a burden on representational rights. They cannot promise political neutrality when used as the basis for relief. Instead, it seems, a decision under these standards would unavoidably have significant political effect, whether intended or not. For example, if we were to demand that congressional districts take a particular shape, we could not ensure the parties that this criterion, neutral enough on its face, would not in fact benefit one political party over another.

541 U.S. at 308-09 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

3. The Bandemer plurality standard, as summarized by the Vieth plurality was overruled:

[I]t would have to be shown that, taking into account a variety of historic factors and projected election results, the group had been denied its chance to effectively influence the political process as a whole, which could be achieved even without electing a candidate. It would not be enough to establish, for example, that Democrats had been placed in a district with a supermajority of other Democratic voters or that the district departs from pre-existing political boundaries. Rather, in a challenge to an individual district the inquiry would focus on the opportunity of members of the group to participate in party deliberations in the slating and nomination of candidates, their opportunity to register and vote, and hence their chance to directly influence the election returns and to secure the attention of the winning candidate. A statewide challenge, by contrast, would involve an analysis of the voters' direct or indirect influence on the elections of the state legislature as a whole. With what has proved to be a gross understatement, the plurality acknowledged this was of necessity a difficult inquiry.

541 U.S. at 282 (plurality opinion) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added by Vieth plurality opinion).

4. Justice Powell's proposed standard in Bandemer, as summarized by the Vieth plurality, was also rejected:

He agreed with the plurality that a plaintiff should show intent and effect, but believed that the ultimate inquiry ought to focus on whether district boundaries had been drawn solely for partisan ends to the exclusion of all other neutral factors relevant to the fairness of redistricting. Under that inquiry, the courts should consider numerous factors, though no one factor should be dispositive. The most important would be the shapes of voting districts and adherence to established political subdivision boundaries. Other relevant considerations include the nature of the legislative procedures by which the apportionment law was adopted and legislative history reflecting contemporaneous legislative goals. These factors, which bear directly on the fairness of a redistricting plan, combined with evidence concerning population disparities and statistics tending to show vote dilution, make out a claim of unconstitutional partisan gerrymandering.

541 U.S. at 290-91 (plurality opinion) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

5. Justice Stevens' proposed standard in his Vieth dissent (and which Justice Kennedy thought was unmanageable) would have rejected any claim attacking the redistricting plan on a statewide basis. 541 U.S. at 323, 328 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("the plaintiffs-appellants lack standing to challenge the districting plan on a statewide basis"). Instead, Justice Stevens would apply strict scrutiny to obvious partisan gerrymanders. "[W]hen partisanship is the legislature's sole motivation--when any pretense of neutrality is forsaken unabashedly and all traditional districting criteria are subverted for partisan advantage--the governing body cannot be said to have acted impartially.” 541 U.S. at 318 (Stevens, J., dissenting). To detect obvious gerrymanders, he would adopt the district-by-district approach developed in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993), and its progeny:

The Shaw line of cases has emphasized that reapportionment is one area in which appearances do matter and has focused both on the shape of the challenged districts and the purpose behind the line-drawing in assessing the constitutionality of majority-minority districts under the Equal Protection Clause. These decisions, like Justice Powell’s opinion in Bandemer, have also considered the process by which the districting schemes were enacted, looked to other evidence demonstrating that purely improper considerations motivated the decision, and included maps illustrating outlandish district shapes.

541 U.S. at 323 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). Justice Stevens focused, for example, on Justice Powell’s observation “that the party in power had excluded the opposition from its deliberations and had placed excessive weight on data concerning party voting trends.” Id. at 322 (citation omitted). To which Justice Kennedy responded, “courts must be cautious about adopting a standard that turns on whether the partisan interests in the redistricting process were excessive. Excessiveness is not easily determined.” 541 U.S. at 316 (Kennedy, J., concurring). It should also be noted that Justice Stevens’ standard apparently would have required that the party supporters victimized by an unlawful gerrymander be a voter minority. 541 U.S. at 333 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

In sum, in evaluating a challenge to a specific district, I would apply the standard set forth in the Shaw cases and ask whether the legislature allowed partisan considerations to dominate and control the lines drawn, forsaking all neutral principles. Under my analysis, if no neutral criterion can be identified to justify the lines drawn, and if the only possible explanation for a district's bizarre shape is a naked desire to increase partisan strength, then no rational basis exists to save the district from an equal protection challenge.

541 U.S. at 339 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Justice Stevens concluded that the claim of only one of the Vieth plaintiffs met his district-specific proposed standard:

Plaintiff-appellant Furey plainly has stated a claim that District 6 constitutes an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander. According to the complaint, Pennsylvania's 2002 redistricting plan splits "Montgomery County alone ... into six different congressional districts." The new District 6 "looms like a dragon descending on Philadelphia from the west, splitting up towns and communities throughout Montgomery and Berks Counties." Furey alleges that the districting plan was created "solely to effectuate the interests" of Republicans, and that the General Assembly relied "exclusively on a principle of maximum partisan advantage" when drawing the plan, "to the exclusion of all other criteria." The 2002 plan "is so irregular on its face that it rationally can be viewed only as an effort ... to advance the interests of one political party, without regard for traditional redistricting principles and without any legitimate or compelling justification." "The problem," Furey claims, is that the legislature "subordinated--indeed ignored--all traditional redistricting principles and all legitimate bases for governmental decisionmaking, in order to favor those with one political viewpoint over another."

The plan “ignores all other traditional redistricting criteria,” she alleges, “thus demonstrating that partisanship--and nothing else--was the rationale behind the plan.”

541 U.S. at 339-40 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Again, a majority of the Court found that these allegations failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

6. Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, thought that a partisan gerrymander would be unconstitutional “if unfairness is sufficiently demonstrable. . . .” 541 U.S. at 343 (Souter, J., dissenting). Justice Souter disagreed with the notion that a judicially manageable standard must be clear and precise. “[W]e can be no more exact in stating a verbal test for too much partisanship than we can be in defining too much race consciousness when some is inevitable and legitimate.” Id. at 344. Apparently siding on one point with Justice Stevens, he expressed his opinion that “we would have better luck at devising a workable prima facie case if we concentrated as much as possible on suspect characteristics of individual districts instead of statewide patterns.” Id. at 346. Justice Souter then set out five elements for establishing a prima facie case of partisan gerrymandering:

First, the resident plaintiff would identify a cohesive political group to which he belonged, which would normally be a major party. . . .

Second, a plaintiff would need to show that the district of his residence paid little or no heed to those traditional districting principles whose disregard can be shown straightforwardly: contiguity, compactness, respect for political subdivisions, and conformity with geographic features like rivers and mountains. . . .

Third, the plaintiff would need to establish specific correlations between the district's deviations from traditional districting principles and the distribution of the population of his group. For example, one of the districts to which appellants object most strongly in this case is District 6, which they say "looms like a dragon descending on Philadelphia from the west, splitting up towns and communities throughout Montgomery and Berks Counties." To make their claim stick, they would need to point to specific protuberances on the Draconian shape that reach out to include Democrats, or fissures in it that squirm away from Republicans. They would need to show that when towns and communities were split, Democrats tended to fall on one side and Republicans on the other. . . .

Fourth, a plaintiff would need to present the court with a hypothetical district including his residence, one in which the proportion of the plaintiff's group was lower (in a packing claim) or higher (in a cracking one) and which at the same time deviated less from traditional districting principles than the actual district. . . . Drawing the hypothetical district would, of course, necessarily involve redrawing at least one contiguous district, and a plaintiff would have to show that this could be done subject to traditional districting principles without packing or cracking his group (or another) worse than in the district being challenged.

Fifth, and finally, the plaintiff would have to show that the defendants acted intentionally to manipulate the shape of the district in order to pack or crack his group.

541 U.S. at 347-50 (Souter, J., dissenting) (citations and footnotes omitted). This would not be an easy test to satisfy. "As for Furey's own claim, her allegations fall short, for example, on the feasibility of an alternative district superior to her own, as I would require. But she might well be able to allege what I would require, if given leave to amend." Id. at 355. If all five elements of prima facie proof were met, Justice Souter would then shift the burden to the defendants to justify their decision by reference to objectives other than naked partisan advantage. They might show by rebuttal evidence that districting objectives could not be served by the plaintiff's hypothetical district better than by the district as drawn, or they might affirmatively establish legitimate objectives better served by the lines drawn than by the plaintiff's hypothetical.

Id. at 351. Thus Justice Souter and Justice Ginsburg would have adopted a partisan gerrymander standard which demanded the same allegation of a satisfactory alternative plan this Court found was required in Montiel v. Davis.

7. Justice Breyer began his dissent by pointing out that “pure politics often helps to secure constitutionally important democratic objectives. But sometimes it does not. Sometimes purely political ‘gerrymandering’ will fail to advance any plausible democratic objective while simultaneously threatening serious democratic harm.” 541 U.S. at 355 (Breyer, J., dissenting). He found it “not surprising that ‘traditional’ districting principles have rarely, if ever, been politically neutral. Rather, because, in recent political memory, Democrats have often been concentrated in cities while Republicans have often been concentrated in suburbs and sometimes rural areas, geographically drawn boundaries have tended to ‘pac[k]’ the former.” Id. at 359 (citations omitted).

As I have said, reference back to these underlying considerations helps to explain why the legislature’s use of political boundary drawing considerations ordinarily does not violate the Constitution's Equal Protection Clause. The reason lies not simply in the difficulty of identifying abuse or finding an appropriate judicial remedy. The reason is more fundamental: Ordinarily, there simply is no abuse. The use of purely political boundary-drawing factors, even where harmful to the members of one party, will often nonetheless find justification in other desirable democratic ends, such as maintaining relatively stable legislatures in which a minority party retains significant representation.

Id. at 360. So Justice Breyer's proposed standard would have dismissed allegations like those in the amended complaint in the instant action that attempt to tie claims of unconstitutional partisan gerrymandering to alleged disparate treatment of districts in urban, suburban and rural regions. He would have outlawed only redistricting plans that unjustifiably entrench one party in power:

At the same time, these considerations can help identify at least one circumstance where use of purely political boundary-drawing factors can amount to a serious, and remediable, abuse, namely, the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power. By entrenchment I mean a situation in which a party that enjoys only minority support among the populace has nonetheless contrived to take, and hold, legislative power. By unjustified entrenchment I mean that the minority's hold on power is purely the result of partisan manipulation and not other factors. These "other" factors that could lead to "justified" (albeit temporary) minority entrenchment include sheer happenstance, the existence of more than two major parties, the unique constitutional requirements of certain representational bodies such as the Senate, or reliance on traditional (geographic, communities of interest, etc.) districting criteria.

Id. at 350-61. Unjustified entrenchment, in Justice Breyer's view, would be unlikely where the party complaining about a gerrymander claimed a statewide majority of voters:

Courts need not intervene often to prevent the kind of abuse I have described, because those harmed constitute a political majority, and a majority normally can work its political will. Where a State has improperly gerrymandered legislative or congressional districts to the majority's disadvantage, the majority should be able to elect officials in statewide races--particularly the Governor--who may help to undo the harm that districting has caused the majority's party, in the next round of districting if not sooner.

Id. at 362. Getting down to specific examples of his proposed “unjustified entrenchment” standard, Justice Breyer cites circumstances where, among other things, “a majority party (as measured by the votes actually cast for all candidates who identify themselves as members of that party in the relevant set of elections; i.e., in congressional elections if a congressional map is being challenged) has twice failed to obtain a majority of the relevant legislative seats in elections. . . .”

Id. at 366.

Two things should be kept in mind about the foregoing summary of the Vieth opinions. First, every one of the past and present proposed standards for detecting an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander was held by a majority of the Court to be judicially unmanageable, and a complaint relying on any of these standards is due to be dismissed. Second, even the standards proposed by the four dissenters are very difficult to satisfy, arguably more difficult than the Bandemer standard that was overruled, and the Gustafson plaintiffs' amended complaint would fail to satisfy them. Under these circumstances, this Court would be fully justified in adopting the bottom line of the Supreme Court's Vieth decision found at the end of the plurality opinion:

Reduced to its essence, Justice Kennedy's opinion boils down to this: "As presently advised, I know of no discernible and manageable standard that can render this claim justiciable. I am unhappy about that, and hope that I will be able to change my opinion in the future." What are the lower courts to make of this pronouncement? We suggest that they must treat it as a reluctant fifth vote against justiciability at district and statewide levels--a vote that may change in some future case but that holds, for the time being, that this matter is nonjusticiable.

541 U.S. at 305 (plurality opinion).

2. The Partisan Gerrymander Standards Alleged in the Amended Complaint Fail To State a Claim Upon Which Relief Can Be Granted.

It is not necessary to do a close reading of Count Two of the instant amended complaint to see that it tries to cherry-pick bits and pieces of the many rejected attempts to state a partisan gerrymandering claim, so that, as was the case for the Vieth plaintiffs, the Gustafson plaintiffs' complaint must be dismissed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6):

Paragraph 133 contains the conclusory allegation that "the Democratic-controlled Alabama Legislature used classification by political party in an invidious manner or in a way unrelated to any legitimate legislative objective.” This quotes the ultimate conclusion Justice Kennedy thinks a manageable standard “must rest . . . on,” 541 U.S. at 307 (Kennedy, J., concurring), but it articulates no such standard.

Paragraph 134 alleges that the House and Senate plans are unconstitutional, on a statewide basis, because they “fragment[] cohesive communities of interest and political subdivisions between purported districts while no legitimate, consistently-applied state policy is supported or furthered by the needless division of these communities.” The fragmenting or cracking of communities of interest and political subdivisions were among the many more evidentiary factors proposed by the three dissenting opinions in Vieth, see pp. ___ supra, but they were rejected by a majority of the Supreme Court, either standing alone or in conjunction with other factors. Indeed, these Gustafson allegations would have been rejected by Justices Stevens, Souter and Ginsburg to the extent they are not district-specific.

Apparently, the novelty Gustafson tries to add is a proposal that fragmenting must be “consistently-applied” to be constitutional. The consistently applied nuance is not found in the Vieth dissents; rather, it comes from the district court opinion in Larios, where it is used to condemn regional discrimination and protection of only one party's incumbents as the sole reasons justifying Georgia's minor population deviations. Larios, 300 F.Supp.2d at 1322, 1331, 1338, 1347, 1349, 1351-55. But Larios held that plaintiffs' partisan gerrymander allegations failed to state a claim, and they were dismissed. 300 F.Supp.2d at 1322. As noted in an earlier section of this brief, the Supreme Court's summary affirmance of Larios provides precedent only for the narrow one-person, one-vote holding and does not disturb the principles decided in Vieth.

Paragraph 135 contains boilerplate vote dilution allegations, albeit vote dilution allegations limited to "fragmentation of cultural, ethnic, geographic[,] economic and political communities. . . ." Vote dilution principles such as these are featured in most of the partisan gerrymander standards rejected in Vieth, including those of the Vieth plaintiffs, Justice Powell and Justice Stevens (although Justices Stevens, Souter and Ginsburg would dismiss this allegation because it is not district-specific). We cannot locate the conclusory adjective "wanton" in any of the Vieth or Larios opinions, but it adds nothing substantive to save this allegation from dismissal.

Paragraph 136 alleges intentional discrimination against "the Republican Party, its members and other citizens who [sic] it may support as candidates.” This allegation makes clear that the real party in interest in this action is the Republican Party. In Alabama there is no party registration of voters and there are no formal “members” of the Republican Party. The Republican Party is itself a legal entity, a political organization with officers and paid staff. And the candidates it supports (which may or may not include all candidates running as Republicans) are identifiable persons. But most voters in Alabama are accustomed to splitting their tickets, and none of the named plaintiffs in this action alleges that he or she is one of the persons referred to in this paragraph. In any case, as shown in the summary of Vieth above, all members of the Supreme Court have rejected the notion that intentional discrimination alone can sustain a constitutional partisan gerrymander claim (or even a racial gerrymander claim). In legislative redistricting, intentional partisan discrimination is always easy to prove. The problem is a lack of any judicially manageable standards for determining what constitutes unconstitutional (or undemocratic) discriminatory effects.

Paragraph 137 alleges discriminatory effect “on Republicans” in unadorned conclusory fashion. As such, read together with the preceding paragraph, it adds nothing to the problems of nonjusticiability and absence of judicially manageable standards.

Paragraph 138 adopts the “unjustified entrenchment” standard of one member of the Supreme Court, Justice Breyer. But Justice Kennedy and the four members of the Vieth plurality flatly rejected this standard, and it should be dismissed. Strictly as an aside, it should be noted that the Gustafson amended complaint fails even Justice Breyer’s proposed standard, which is designed to prevent a situation where “a majority party (as measured by the votes actually cast for all candidates who identify themselves as members of that party in the relevant set of elections; i.e., in congressional elections if a congressional map is being challenged) has twice failed to obtain a majority of the relevant legislative seats in elections. . . .” Id. at 366. By this standard, the relevant set of elections for the instant action would be Alabama House and Senate elections, and in 2002 the Democratic Party was the majority party: 52.35% of the statewide electorate voted for Democratic candidates in Senate races, and 51.37% voted for Democratic candidates in House races. This Court can take judicial notice of the official election returns on the Secretary of State’s web site, <http://www.sos.state.al.us/downloads/dl3.cfm?trgturl=election/2002/2002GeneralElectionTotals.XLS&trgtfile=2002GeneralElectionTotals.XLS>. The Court rejected the Vieth plaintiffs’ contention that election returns for other statewide offices were relevant. Even so, in Alabama, while Republican candidates won most of the nonjudicial statewide offices, they did not win them all, because of obvious ticket-splitting:

| Office | Statewide total vote | Repub total vote | Repub % vote | Dem total vote | Dem % vote | Dem seats | Dem o % seats |
|---------------------|----------------------|------------------|--------------|----------------|------------|-----------|---------------|
| State Senate | 1,236,306 | 549,943 | 44.48 | 647,267 | 52.35 | 25 | 71.4 |
| State House | 1,199,583 | 558,087 | 46.52 | 616,224 | 51.37 | 63 | 60.0 |

| Secretary of State | 1,290,010 | 630,863 | 48.90 | 632,852 | 49.06 | 1 | 100 |
| Treasurer | 1,301,716 | 660,873 | 50.77 | 609,544 | 46.83 | 0 | 0 |
| Commissioner of Ag | 1,270,033 | 590,350 | 46.16 | 656,382 | 51.32 | 1 | 100 |
| Auditor | 1,277,663 | 655,189 | 51.28 | 579,899 | 45.39 | 0 | 0 |
| PSC Place 1 | 1,293,644 | 581,168 | 44.92 | 674,888 | 52.17 | 1 | 0 |
| PSC Place 2 | 1,299,967 | 734,720 | 56.52 | 526,721 | 40.52 | 0 | 0 |

The amended complaint does allege that, notwithstanding the election returns for state legislative races, it is supported by a majority of Alabama voters. But, as noted above, Justice Breyer’s “unjustified entrenchment” theory rules out judicial intervention when the complaining party has a voter majority. “Where a State has improperly gerrymandered legislative or congressional districts to the majority’s disadvantage, the majority should be able to elect officials in statewide races--particularly the Governor--who may help to undo the harm that districting has caused the majority's party, in the next round of districting if not sooner." So, according to the amended complaint, the Republican Party should need no judicial help. Indeed, Rep. Scott Beason, who heads the Republican Legislative Committee, has stated publicly that the instant lawsuit is only one part of the Republican Party's strategy for winning majorities in both houses of the Legislature and that they expect to succeed in 2006 with the existing districts. "We're mounting our (takeover) effort based on the present districts, but ... that lawsuit would give us a 350-pound lineman and star tailback to win the game in 2006,' Beason said." Tom Gordon, "Republicans Working for Majorities in 2006," The Birmingham News (online edition), April 19, 2005.

Finally, paragraph 139 alleges in conclusory terms that "impermissible partisan gerrymanders contained in the state legislative redistricting plans are visible to the judicial eye and subject to judicially manageable standards." This is language lifted from Justice Stevens' opinion, joined by Justice Breyer, concurring in the summary affirmance of Larios, 124

S.Ct. at 2808. But it is taken out of context. Justice Stevens was not referring to what was binding precedent, but what might have been binding precedent had the Court decided Vieth differently. He acknowledges that the Larios summary affirmance amounts to nothing more than rejection of Georgia's invitation "to weaken the one-person, one-vote standard by creating a safe harbor for population deviations of less than ten percent, within which districting decisions could be made for any reason whatsoever." Id. Then he laments what might have been:

It bears emphasis, however, that had the Court in Vieth adopted a standard for adjudicating partisan gerrymandering claims, the standard likely would have been satisfied in this case. Appellees alleged that the House and Senate plans were the result of an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander. The District Court rejected that claim because it considered itself bound by the plurality opinion in Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), and appellees could not show that they had been "essentially shut out of the political process." App. to Juris. Statement 86a (quoting Bandemer, 478 U.S., at 139). Appellees do not challenge that ruling, and it is not before us. But the District Court's detailed factual findings regarding appellees' equal protection claim confirm that an impermissible partisan gerrymander is visible to the judicial eye and subject to judicially manageable standards. Indeed, the District Court's findings make clear that appellees could satisfy either the standard endorsed by the Court in its racial gerrymandering cases or that advocated in Justice Powell's dissent in Bandemer, 478 U.S., at 173-185.

124 S.Ct. at 2808 (bold emphasis added). In short, an actionable partisan gerrymander in Larios was apparent to only two sets of judicial eyes, who revisited their failed effort to locate judicially manageable standards in the racial gerrymandering cases and in Justice Powell’s Bandemer dissent. The Vieth majority rejected each of these standards, as well as the suggestion that, like unconstitutional pornography, judges can know an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander when they see it.

Whether the allegations of Count Two are viewed separately or together, they offer no standard upon which judicial relief could be granted that has not already been held insufficient by a majority of the Supreme Court. Even had one of the Vieth dissenters’ proposed standards won a majority, the Gustafson amended complaint could not survive it. Three of the dissenters would have required much more district specificity than is alleged here. And all of them, Justices Souter and Ginsburg in particular, would have required plaintiffs to allege “the feasibility of an alternative district superior to [their] own. . . .” Vieth, 541 U.S. at 355 (Souter, J., dissenting).

B. COUNT THREE, ALLEGING A PARTISAN GERRYMANDER THAT VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT, FAILS TO STATE A CLAIM.

Count Three alleges in conclusory fashion that the partisan gerrymander challenged in Count Two under the Fourteenth Amendment also violates the Freedom of Association Clause of the First Amendment. In Vieth Justice Kennedy opined that “[w]here it is alleged that a gerrymander had the purpose and effect of imposing burdens on a disfavored party and its voters, the First Amendment may offer a sounder and more prudential basis for intervention than does the Equal Protection Clause.” 541 U.S. at 315 (Kennedy, J., concurring). The Gustafson plaintiffs suggest in Count Three that this offers a different cause of action for partisan gerrymandering. It does not. Justice Kennedy qualified his ruminations on possible applicability of the First Amendment with this caveat: “Of course, all this depends first on courts’ having available a manageable standard by which to measure the effect of the apportionment and so to conclude that the State did impose a burden or restriction on the rights of a party’s voters.” Id. Count Three of the Gustafson plaintiffs’ amended complaint adds nothing to their failure in Count Two to articulate a manageable standard, and this Count should be dismissed as well.

III. THIS ACTION IS BARRED BY LACHES.

The original complaint in this action was filed June 16, 2005. The district court’s decision in Larios came down February 10, 2004. Less than two weeks later, counsel for the Gustafson plaintiffs announced in the press that “he plans to file a federal court suit within a couple of weeks based on the Georgia decision.”

Phillip Rawls, “Republican lawyer readies challenge of legislative districts,” The Montgomery Advertiser (online edition), Feb. 23, 2004. The Chairman of the Alabama Republican Party said at the same time that “the party is reviewing the Georgia decision and is seriously considering a lawsuit because of the similarities between Alabama’s and Georgia’s districts.” Id. However, no lawsuit was filed before the 2004 Regular Session of the Alabama Legislature adjourned.

The Supreme Court summarily affirmed Larios on June 30, 2004. On July 17, 2004, the press reported:

Marty Connors, chairman of the Alabama Republican Party, said he is talking with some business groups about helping the party fund a similar legal challenge to Alabama’s legislative districts. “The Republican Party can’t do it alone,” Connors said. “I’d love to see it pursued, but people who’ve got something to gain by seeing that we have a more business-oriented Legislature would have to agree to it.” No matter what the state GOP does, former Republican judge Mark Montiel says he will definitely file a suit contending that Alabama’s legislative districts are improperly drawn. Montiel wants them redesigned before Alabama’s next legislative election in 2006.

Phillip Rawls, “Republicans eye challenge to Alabama legislative districts,” The Associated Press (online edition), July 17, 2004. But the year 2004 came and went, and no such lawsuit was filed. Then came this announcement in February 2005:

Emboldened by a U.S. Supreme Court victory for their Georgia brethren, Alabama Republicans announced Saturday that they will soon file a federal lawsuit in Mobile challenging the district lines of the state Legislature. Party Vice Chairman Jerry Lathan of Theodore explained the suit to members of the Alabama Republican Executive Committee as a key in the GOP's effort to win control of the Democratic-controlled Legislature in 2006. The suit will assert that existing lines pack Republican voters into fewer districts, while creating sparsely populated districts that favor Democrats. The alleged pattern, Republicans argue, dilutes GOP voters' influence in the Legislature and violates the principle of "one man, one vote." . . . Lathan said the suit would be filed later this month, after more plaintiffs are recruited from the affected Republican districts. GOP attorney Mark Montiel of Montgomery will work with the Georgia attorneys who handled the case in their state, Lathan said.

Bill Barrow, "Republicans to challenge district lines," The Mobile Register (online edition), Feb. 13, 2005. But this lawsuit was not filed later in February 2005. In fact, no such lawsuit was filed during the Regular Session of the Legislature, which convened on February 1, 2005, and adjourned on May 16, 2005.

<http://www.legislature.state.al.us/>. It was exactly one month after the Regular Session adjourned that this action commenced. The next Regular Session of the Legislature does not convene until January 10, 2006, and April 7, 2006, is the qualifying deadline for primary elections.

<http://www.sos.state.al.us/downloads/dl3.cfm?trgturl=election/2006/2006fcpafilingcalendar.pdf&trgtfile=2006fcpafilingcalendar.pdf>.

It is apparent that the commencement of this action was delayed purposefully to ensure that the Legislature would have as little opportunity as possible to correct any constitutional violations plaintiffs are asking this Court to find. Nothing in the original or amended complaint suggests a reason why the suit could not have been filed in early 2004, when all the grounds for relief now asserted were apparent. It should be dismissed on grounds of laches. Arizona Minority Coalition for Fair Redistricting v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Commission, 366 F.Supp.2d 887, 908-09 (D. Ariz. 2005) (challenge to state legislative districts two years after they were drawn barred by laches); Fouts v. Harris, 88 F.Supp.2d 1351 (S.D. Fla. 1999) (challenge to state's congressional districts filed four years after relevant precedent barred by laches). But see Kelley v. Bennett, 96 F.Supp.2d 1301, (M.D. Ala.) (3-judge court), rev'd on other grnds, sub nom. Sinkfield v. Kelley, 531 U.S. 28 (2000) (laches defense overruled even though the Alabama Supreme Court had dismissed a state court challenge to legislative districts because of impending 1998 elections: "Nowhere in the supreme court papers that we have did the possibility of court-ordered special elections in 2000, or of enjoining future use of these districts, either in special elections or in 2002.") (citing Rice v. Sinkfield, 732 So.2d 993, 993 (Ala.1998)).

In Sanders v. Dooly County, 245 F.3d 1289, 1291-92 (11th Cir. 2001), the Eleventh Circuit upheld the district court's ruling that a Shaw challenge to county commission districts was barred by laches insofar as it sought injunctive relief late in the decade. But it held that laches did not bar a declaratory judgment action, because a ruling of unconstitutionality would prevent the challenged plan from being used as a retrogression baseline in § 5 preclearance proceedings. However, the Alabama legislative districts have already survived a Shaw challenge in Montiel v. Davis, so there is no similar justification for not invoking laches in the instant case.

IV. CONCLUSION.

The Gustafson plaintiffs' claims are barred by res judicata principles from relitigating the same issues presented to the three-judge court in Montiel v. Davis and Rice v. English. That includes the partisan gerrymandering claims, which could have been raised by the Montiel plaintiffs and were actually adjudicated as a result of the defenses asserted in that case. This is what the U.S. Supreme Court meant when it reminded us that the state "can have only one set of legislative districts." Grove v. Emison, 507 U.S. at 35. There has been no change of law that creates new causes of action that plaintiffs like these can use to promote their purely partisan interests, and even if the relevant law had changed, the parties in Montiel v. Davis and their privies could not rely on it to avoid preclusion of their claims.

Alternatively, the amended complaint fails to state a claim upon which can be granted, and all the claims are barred by laches.
